Python is an amazing language when it comes to rapidly developing instrument control or data evaluation programs. However, when you want to package your program such that it can run on an air-gapped computer, the situation becomes a bit more tricky. In this very brief talk I give an overview of what tools are available and talk in more detail about PyApp and box, two tools that might can help with these tasks.